K.

K k Roman, K k Italic, both which are used in the English and several European languages; K k black letter English and German, pronounced alone ká, but ought by analogy to be called k', as b', c', d', and the rest of the mute sisters; Κ κ Κάππα Greek, from the Chaldee כפ Kaph, signifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure resembles, the lower part whereof being elongated makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek Κ, and by imminution, and bowing the right side, the small κ. The power of which letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κερκίς, querqueda, dim. querquedula; κοινόν, coenum: and in like manner the Latin C is expressed by the Greek Κ; as, Claudius Caesar, Κλαύδιος Καῖσαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only answers in sound to K, but also takes its figure from the same Hebrew letter: For as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as is before shewed, so C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the Western way of writing. Notwithstanding it appears that antiently K held its own place in many (especially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as καλάβρα, kalabra, κοινισμός, koenismus, Καρχινός, Karthago, καλάνδαι, kalendae; though these also are equally writ by c, vid. Quint. Instit. 1, 7. K has also been continued in some words of Hebrew extraction; as, Karissimus, in antient monuments, from קר; Kalumniā, from כלמה; K k antiently marked on the foreheads of those convicted of calumny. In our English tongue indeed, though disused in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but used even after c, to harden its sound; as from λεῖχα, lick, κικνός, (Hesych. gallus) a chick; which in words of Latin and Greek derivation may well be spared; as public, critic, hætic; not publick, &c.

L.

L I Roman, L I Italic, L I old English and German, which pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, as we also pronounce the other sister liquids, el, em, en, er corruptly ar; to distinguish them from the family of the mutes, whose sound we make articulate by postponing e, as bé, cé, dé, &c., Hebrew ל Lamedb, amongst other significations denoting a goad, or spit, which the figure resembles; Chaldee ל Lamda, from whence the Greek Lambda, by inserting b; as also by removing m, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Δ, by straightning one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the basis. It hath the first place in the order of the liquids, and is, as Plato in Cratyl. has observed, the sweetest of them, and is suited to soft and easy descriptions; as, Molle meum levibus cor est violabile telis. It was usually sounded by the old Britons with a kind of aspiration, and was writ in many words with ll, as afterwards with lb, as in llán, or lbán, a temple; lláu, or lbáu, an hand; which sound is made, by hissing l obliquely through the teeth, and aspirating it, which indeed is best taken by the ear. Thus the oldest Greeks sounded its sister P when initial, PH; as PHOMA, Roma; which in later times, after H was exterminated, being supplied by a note of aspiration prefixed, though pronounced after it, was writ as now, Ῥόμῃ; and this aspiration is still kept in some Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhamnus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is subjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of syllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblandior; flo, confligo; gloria, conглоbo; plango, compleo: also to t and th, in derivatives from the Greek, as Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by grammarians are called immutables; as indeed they are with respect to the mutes, but not in regard to themselves, as we learn from Νύμφη, lympba, ager, agellus; λεῖριον, lilium, παῦλος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepositions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding some simple word beginning therewith, seems arbitrary; and we may write either conligo, or colligo; inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interlego, or intellego, &c. since the former way of writing was of antient use; as in all the other letters, so even in these particularly; and the latter only introduced to soften the sound: as we see also in prepositions ending with mutes, prefixt to words beginning with mutes or liquids, for the same reason suffer the same, or greater variations; as, absfero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adsero, offero; obsero, affero; transno, trano, &c. In some few words indeed the liquid l may seem substituted for d; as lacryma for δάκρυμα, alacris for ἀδανδρος; but both these derivations may justly be suspected, unless confirmed by more unexceptionable instances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as antiently made by the Saxons, ƿ, making the curve angular, analogically to V, five, as being half an X, ten. In the compendious notes of the antients, L stands for Laelius, Laelia, Lucius, Luceius, Lex, Lettor, Libertus, Libra; L. A. Lex alia; LA. C. Latini coloni; *L. A. M.

M in Latin; μ Greek, called $\mu\epsilon$, either from its sound, the Greek $\mu\epsilon\alpha$ and the Latin mugio being formed from hence, or rather from $\mu\epsilon\alpha$, claudio, because it opens and shuts the lips; \aleph Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; \beth or, if the vacant space in the end of a line require it, \beth : it is perhaps called \beth mem from its double form, open and shut, which in writing its name is represented; or it may be from \beth a blot, which the Arabians use for its figure: \mathfrak{M} in English and German black letter. Its sound is inarticulate, formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, suffers no mute in Latin to stand before it in the same syllable, except g, as in agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a softer sound, it follows s, and t, as $\sigma\mu\epsilon\eta$, $\sigma\sigma\mu\alpha$, $\tau\mu\eta\sigma\iota\varsigma$; but in different syllables it doth not refuse to usher its sister labials b and p, as ambulo, amplus; also itself and n, as mamma, damnum, but no other: For in order to avoid the company of the rest, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its substitute, as in anceps, anfraetus, anbulo, anquiro, ansanctus (but this is also writ amsanctus) which are all compounded of the inseparable preposition am: but the preposition circum for the most part keeps its m before all letters, though in some few words n is used sometimes indifferently for it, as circundo, or circumdo; and sometimes loseth it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before it its sister femivowels i and r, its cognates, soften the sound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodestus; combibo, compleo, commendo: also in the Greek tongue, as $\epsilon\mu\beta\alpha\lambda\lambda\omega$, $\epsilon\mu\mu\epsilon\eta\omega$, $\epsilon\mu\pi\iota\sigma\tau\omega$, and also antiently in divers words, as in the Sigeian Psephism in honour of Antiochus, $\tau\eta\mu\ \beta\alpha\sigma\iota\lambda\epsilon\iota\alpha\upsilon$, $\tau\omega\mu\ \pi\alpha\rho\alpha\gamma\mu\alpha\tau\omega\upsilon$, $\tau\eta\mu\ \mu\epsilon\eta\ \epsilon\pi\epsilon\iota\alpha\upsilon$: Also before t, d, and q, as in tantum from tam tum, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M also in Latin words is put for the Greek v, as in musam for $\mu\upsilon\sigma\alpha\upsilon$, organum for $\delta\rho\gamma\alpha\upsilon\omega\upsilon$, &c. But in Latin accusatives of the third declension, which answers to the fifth of the Greeks, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, matrem, from $\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha$, $\mu\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha$. It is also servile in forming tenses of Latin verbs, as notabam, notarem, from notare: This servility perhaps might be the reason why the antients very obscurely pronounced this letter, especially before a vowel, as optimu'st, factu'st. Cato writ die' banc for diem banc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then use it short, as Cujus non hederæ circumiere caput, Propert. 2, 4, 26. not fully pronounced. M in numerals is one thousand, from the first letter of mille according to Priscian, but with more probability from this antient mark $\epsilon\iota\theta$, which by the negligence or ignorance of transcribers was drawn together and made $\epsilon\mu$, the half of which, ϵ , from hence stands for five hundred. In the compendious notes of the antients, M. is used for Manlius, Marcus, Martius, or Mucius; M' Manius; M. B. Mulier bona; MAG. EQ. Magister equitum; MAG. MIL. Magister militum; MAT. P. FEC. & S. P. Q. Mater pia fecit & suis posterisque; M. M. P. Manu, mancipio, potestate.

N.

N, in Roman, N in Italic, both which are, as all the other letters, frequently used in most of the modern languages of Europe; especially such as descend from the Latin. The English indeed, besides these, have a black character somewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expressed, N; but of no great antiquity, and seldom used but in printing statutes and proclamations; for our Saxon ancestors used a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter, the one initial and medial נ, the other final ן, which might be the cause of calling it ן, which is expressive of both forms; in analogy to ם, which probably was so called from the same cause. Indeed there is a great shew of reason why it should be called ן from the signification of the word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of her mother ן. The Greeks, in taking these two letters from them, seem to have had regard to both these reasons, discarding the finals in both, as having no occasion for them in their tongue; and yet, to shew their near relation, gave them an analogical articulation, calling as the former Μυ, so the latter Νυ. Nor are these two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, sound, and mutual offices in Greek and Latin. With respect to their figure, they differ just so much, and no more, in both the capital and small form, as they do in their sound; Μ μ being a fuller sound, having one line more than Ν ν the smaller sound, without any other difference. Their nearness in sound is more remarkable because made by distinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is caused by their equally touching the palate. Nor is their reciprocal use in languages less obvious: The plural termination ן in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ן; as, on the contrary, the terminations ον and ων in Greek, are um in Latin; as οὖν οὖν, centum; βραχίων, brachium: αν and ων, the terminations of the accus. sing. of the second declension of the Greeks; am in the first declension of the Latins; as μῦσαν, σχολήν, mysam, scholam. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as ν is sometimes changed into μ, as in νέω, meo; so on the contrary μ into ν, as in μείδω, nideo: and as before the first rank of the mutes, and their sister labial μ, ν is changed into μ for the better sound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; so on the contrary, in the second and third order, μ is converted into ν before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquis, quendam, tantum: which also is done before f and b, as in anfractus, anhelus. The change of this letter into her other sister liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better sound in pure Latin words; but the same is also done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from νη, lymph from νύμφη (whence our master Priscian accounts for the use of the Latin numeral L, instead of N the Greek numeral for 50, The most antient Greeks, saith he, used L for N, which we still herein retain) in mora, from μωρη, in crisso, from κρῖς. As γ, before α, γ, χ, is in Greek sounded like ν, so in Latin words derived from such, ν is substituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, Anchises, for ἀγκυρα, ἀγγελος, Ἀγχίσων, though the more antient Latins, Accius in particular, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggulus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in some of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, ν is inserted, especially before mutes of the second and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, scando, frango, from μυγῶ, λιγῶ, ζυγῶ, σκαδῶ, παγῶ, the second fut. tense of μυγέω, λιγέω, ζεύγω, σκαδζω, πῖστω, which epenthetical custom is worthy to be noted, as by means whereof from verbs barytones the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inserted ν disappears often in their derivatives, as in mixturio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fragor, fragilis; as also before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognosco, and others. Besides the letters already mentioned, ν admits after it itself, s and x (a compound of s, and the second order of the mutes) as annus, ansa, anxius; and in composition j and v, as conjicio, convoco. In writing some Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to soften the sound, leave out ν, as Ὀρτήσιος, Κλήμης, Πέδης, for Hortensius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchise Greek words ending in ων; as Leo, Draco, for Λεων, Δράκων: contrariwise, to Latin words ending in ο, the Greeks add ν, writing Κάτων, Νέρων, for Cato, Nero. In some inscriptions of the middle age, and transcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter in long syllables of many words inserted; as Atlans, gigans, elephans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the transcribers, mistaking a mark set over such syllables, by some of the antient writers, only to shew their quantity, for the letter ν. I should have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct case of such words, because they found it in the oblique cases, had not such words as formosus and thesaurus checked that opinion. In the notes of the antients, N is read Nec, nepos, non, num, Nomius, noster, nomisma, nisi, nummorum, numerator; NAV. Naves, navibus, navicula; NC. Nunc; N.C. Non certè, vel Nero Caesar, vel Nero Claudius; NC. SN. CO. S.D.E. Notis civibus senatus consulti suffragium datum est; N.C. N.P. Non clam, nec precario; N.C.C. Non calumniae causâ; NBL. Nobilis; N.L. Non liquet; NO. Nobis; N.P. Notarius publicus.

O, immediately from the original Greek of the same form, wherein also it continues in most of the languages of Europe, indeed all which confess a Greek or Latin descent, the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter in the Latin and English alphabets, had a double sound, both short and long, as, if we were not told so by Quint. Inst. I, 13. is evident in itself. For it could not be otherwise before the invention of o, several ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from o, but the same, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that also often not observed by the Greek poets; or perhaps doubled, as its small figure o seems to evince; and its sound, which differs very little from that of ou, which most antiently was sometimes expressed by a single o, as Fabius tells us, and we are further assured from the Besporphidon and Delian inscriptions; in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΔΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΝΡΑΤΟΣ, ἔσθ for Φανοδίκου εἰμι τοῦ Ἑρμοκράτους, and in the latter, ΤΟ ΑΥΤΤΟ ΛΙΘΟ ΑΝΔΡΙΑΣ, for τὸ αὐτὸ λίθου. And the name of o itself was originally ou, as Quintilian intimates. What I have said of this fourth vowel, may be alike affirmed of the second e, which had also two sounds before the invention of u; at which time, as o had both the sound and name of ou, e seems to have had the sound, and sometimes name of eu, for antiently they writ and read ΤΕΙ ΑΓΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ for τῇ ἀγαθῇ τύχῃ; as the more modern Greeks writ: wherein, and in the like words, they however subscribed the exterminated u. Indeed this increase of the number of vowels seems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real necessity; seeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occasion for such an innovation. But the Greeks rested not here, for they invented also six supernumerary consonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather nexus literarum than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the same orders and the letter Η. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the second order; and ψ the first. In like manner, θ includes Η in the first mutes of the third order; χ includes the same in the mutes of the second; and φ doth the same in the first order: and all these were writ in the first Greek alphabet with two distinct letters. For the letter β held the same place in the Greek alphabet as it doth now in the Latin and ours, at the time when these letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may observe, that of all these eight new letters, as the Greeks pleased to call them, the Latins only espoused two ψ and φ, the former whereof they seldom used, as indeed having no occasion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and servile uses; so unnecessary they accounted these innovations. This I judged proper in this place to observe once for all, to shew the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a farther dissertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, so undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew ו, to which it answers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is seventy. How o by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural was sagaciously found out, and judiciously accounted for, by the learned Dr. Littleton; who observes, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels a, e, u, from the Hebrew א, ה, ו to which three consonants they assigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for א reading a; for ה, e and i; for ו, o and u. Now the Greeks observing that the Hebrews had given their first guttural א a vocal power, not knowing how better to transplant them, gave the same power to the three remaining gutturals, making e from ה be; u from ו hbeth, Chald. hbetha; and o from ו, which, as we said above, was first sounded u, but afterwards, that o might be upon a level with e, to which as having a double sound they had given a double character, to the long sound of o they assigned likewise a double figure Ω, which from its largeness in respect to the o they called Ω μέγα, or the great o, and consequentially the primitive o began to be called ο μικρά, or the little o. As to the form of o, this account may be given: Its mother ו signifies either an eye, or a fountain, which this figure in some sort represents; the former with its corner, the latter with its stream. The Greeks neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to express the round form of the mouth in making the sound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, as every other vowel into it; as from απατρον aratrum, so from spartum sporta: as from γόνυ genu, so from pendo pondus; as from κίνis, cinis, so from ὀπισθε post; as from ἀλo alumnus, so from νόξ, nox. This vowel was not in use among some nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, the Tuscans, and more antient Umbrians, and therefore u was substituted for it. And indeed the antient Roman writers sometimes do the same, as Acherunte, bubus, frundesce, &c. Lucr. On the contrary, others used o more frequently for u, writing advorsus, quom, servom, voltis, volnus, &c. for adversus, quum, &c. O is also used by the antients for au, as codex, colis, plodo, plostrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. In the notes of the antients, O. CON. is read Opus conductum; O. C. Q. Opera, confiliique; O. D. M. Operae donum, munus; O. LO. Opus locatum.

P.

P, Roman, P, p, Italic, P, p, English black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor indeed use, the Roman and Italic character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as indeed of all the Roman letters, was antiently the same with the Grecian, as Pliny informs us, and is confirmed by antient monuments. And indeed it is still but very little different; which may be seen, as in the rest, so particularly in this letter, P being only Γ with the transverse and depending line drawn semicircular. And indeed the Greek Γ itself differs no more, scarcely so much, from its original the Hebrew final ה when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the same in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, פה pe, signifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure somewhat represents. Its place is the fifteenth letter in the English and Roman alphabets, and the first in the first order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation because of their nearness in sound and use; for p is only a softer b, as b an harder p. The antient Latins writ Burrhus for the Greek Πυρρὸς, and in their own language sometimes were at a stand whether to write b or p; as in the instance of Fabius, whether obtineo, or optineo, since more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is also proportionably demonstrated in their very figure, P being half of B. Yea that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reason only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo, and bor of the third conjugation, as in nubo, scribo, labor, wherein the harder sound b, when a consonant is to follow, is changed into the softer, p; and this not only in declining such words, but this p from b remains also in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives; as from scribo, scriptus, scriptura, scriptio, scriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages especially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew ברא and ברך; thus the Latin palpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλέφαρον and βιβών, and vice versâ; ab and sub from ἀπό and ὑπό. This their proximity in nature, sound and use, is excellently denoted in their Greek and Latin figures, Γ and P, representing one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle sound, but also into its aspirate φ, especially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λείβω, λείπω, λείφω, where we find ε before a vowel changed into π before a consonant (as was before noted in Latin verbs of the same termination) and π again changed into φ. So in κατήλιπε, ιφος, ιφι, &c. gryps, gryphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologies is changed into p, as Περσεφόνη, Proserpina. To this first order of the mutes belong f and v, into which p is also changed, as πήγω, figo; πείθω, fido, pilus, filum; and as from λεπίς, levis, so on the contrary from ovis, opilio. Nor doth p refuse the intercourse of her sisters of the second order; hence is lepus from λαγώς, lupus from λύκος; not of q which belongs to this order: For from ἵππος, Aeol. ἵκκος, comes equus: πότε, Ion. κότε, quoties; πῆ, Ion. κῆ, quâ. The correspondence of this mute with the sisterhood of the third rank is visible in σπουδή, studium; πέραν, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. for adpeto, adplico. Some kindred between p and the liquids is also averred by etymologists, but which is, in my opinion, precarious, as too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as plaga, promo: but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, b, n, s, t, as phasma, philus, phanaticus; dyspnoea; psephisma, psilae; Ptolemeus, diptoton. Here it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchise a Greek word in which pt begins a syllable, they leave out either the former or latter, writing cubo, perna, tussis, for κύπτω, πέρνηα, πύσις. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, l, m, r; as culpa, campus, carpo; n also, but always by her proxy m, as compleo, compono, for conpleo, conpono. In derivatives from Greek the initial p is sometimes omitted, as in latus from πλατύς, uro, from πυρῶ; which however seems to appear in combuo for compuro. This letter seems also sometimes to be inserted in some Latin words derived from Greek, to hinder the collision of two vowels, as in lapis from λάας, dapes from δαΐς. P in the notes of the antients, is read, Publius, pondo; PA. DIG. Patricia dignitas; P. C. Patres conscripti; P. F. Publii filius; P. P. Propositum, Propositum publicè; *P. P. P. P. E. S. S. S. E. V. V. V. V. V. V. F. F. F. F. Primus pater patriae professus est. Secum salus sublata est; venit victor validus vincens vires urbis vestrae ferro, fame, flammâ, frigore. Val. Prob. de Lit. Antiq. P. R. Populus Romanus; PR. S.
